Excerpt: . . . to repair their broken fortunes as soon as the floods should have receded. To assist people in such emergencies, there is an organization called The Society of the Red Cross. It is a very great and a very humane society. It is composed of kind-hearted men and women, and has branch organizations in every civilized country in the world. This society goes to the relief of sufferers by flood, war, famine, or any similar calamity. Of course its representatives were at that time in the Ohio Valley, and were doing all they could for the afflicted people. At the head of the American Branch of The Society of the Red Cross is Miss Clara Barton, a noble woman whose unselfish work has made her to be loved and honored wherever she is known. To her the editor intrusted the money contributed by The Little Six. Some weeks had elapsed, when one morning the editor of the great city paper received a letter which bore the seal of the Red Cross Society. It was postmarked Shawneetown, Ill. The next morning the readers of the paper found in its columns another story. It was written by Miss Barton herself, and was as follows: Few incidents have ever touched me more deeply than the story of The Little Six, and I determined to find, if possible, a special place for their offering. We have been for weeks in the flooded districts, and have been as far south...
