Excerpt: . age of our ovum and certain theoretical considerations regarding the decidua which arise in connection with that problem. In attempting to place our specimen, in point of age, among other recorded cases we were met with so many difficulties and contradictions that it seemed worth while to ascertain whether, by applying the precise data of our own case to the other records, we could arrive at a more consistent chronological sequence than afforded by His rule. We have therefore reviewed the literature from this point of view, and shall now give the result of our enquiries. In estimating the age of the human ovum or embryo, it is customary to make use of the convention of His, and to reckon, as the approximate age of the ovum, the interval between the date on which the first omitted period should have commenced and the termination of the pregnancy. This is fairly satisfactory from the embryological point of view when dealing with embryos of the sizes commonly found, but it conflicts not only with some facts of clinical experience, but also with the data of comparative embryology, and it fails altogether when applied to many of the very young ova which are on record. For the calculation of the age of the present ovum we have quite precise data regarding coition. The coitus of 2nd October may be definitely rejected as a possible factor in the case. The data provided by several of the cases...
